

College instructor

Bryce started teaching college courses while he was a graduate student. He left his teaching job at SFSU when he took the job at Qantel. A few years later, his former boss at SFSU called him and invited him back to teach business computer night classes on a part-time basis. Bryce's time management skills kicked in and he accepted the job. He stayed at SFSU 12 more years.

Towards the end of his teaching assignment at SFSU, Bryce started to teach business information systems night classes at Skyline College in San Bruno. He did that for 6 years, and was recently invited back to teach some online classes in the same field.

While at Skyline, Bryce was hired to teach computer science classes at the College of San Mateo. He has been teaching at CSM since 1993. He has taught daytime, evening, Saturday, and online classes with as many as 70 students per section – all on a part-time basis (since he was still working full-time in the computer industry). Bryce developed the first online class in the Computer and Information Science department and even wrote the software to manage those courses (this was before professional course management packages existed). He has developed many types of class materials, including a series of video tutorials that he uses today with his classroom and online sections. (There was even one semester when Bryce taught at SFSU, Skyline, and CSM, all while still working in private industry. Talk about time management!)

Bryce has always received excellent evaluations from faculty reviewers and students.
